PODERE SANTA MARIA

Montalcino, Toscana

Marino Colleoni's winemaking journey began when he and wife Luisa discovered a patch of old vines buried amongst the landscape on Montalcino's northern reaches.

They began clearing away the shrubs and to their surprise a rather detailed vineyard lay beneath. After restoring the terraces and replanting damaged vines, they harvested for the first time in 2000. Sitting just below the town at almost five hundred metres above sea level, the vineyards are some of the highest in Montalcino and unusually, face almost entirely north, a real benefit in the age of climate change. Today they farm just over one and half hectares in Montalcino, on sites surrounded by forest planted over a complex mix of sand, limestone and volcanic rock. They also rent a further hectare and a half in Castiglione d'Orcia.

A visionary in the area, Marino has worked organically from the outset and has experimented working without treatments entirely. In the cantina he exercises a considered restraint and great patience, ageing the wines in large oak casks until they are ready and rendering Sangiovese that is uncommonly pure, detailed and fine.

In recent years, Marino has also begun buying grapes from further afield in Grosseto, from which he makes the kind of rustic, easygoing wines he and Luisa like to drink out on their terrace.

SELVARELLA
2022

Sangiovese from a small parcel of twenty year old vines planted over volcanic soils in Castiglione d'Orcia, right by Monte Amiata. The grapes were destemmed and macerated on the skins for three weeks, before being pressed off for a year of rest in old oak casks. Despite the warmth of the vintage, Marino has produced a soulful, elegant wine that impresses with dark cherry, smoke and minerals. A great introduction to the house style, for those of us for whom his Brunello might be a stretch.
